China was ruled by an emperor who was looked upon during his reign as the most remarkable man of his time. But though Tai Tsung possess a more than ordinary mind, he had been trained in the superstitious school of those days, and considered himself the greatest of all men, and descended from a line of emperors of divine origin. So conceited did he flually become that he caused it to be announced throughout the empire that he would give an important office to the subject who could produce any invention or object that he could not explain. So great a reward naturally attracted the attention of bold adventurers all over the empire, and so many presented themselves that certain days were set apart for an examination of their claims.

But one day a youth, having the bearing of a person of rank, and with two attendants, presented himself at the palace gates and demanded an audience with the emperor. After some little delay they were led before Tal Tsung, who sat upon a throne in the court garden.

"I have three tests which I wish to submit." said the youth. "Two had their origin in thy country, O Tai Tsung, and the other comes from my people." Taking a package from one of his attendants he placed it upon the ground and displayed the contents to the emperor. These were simply a coil of rope, an umbrella of native make and a small box.

"Your Imperial Majesty observes," said the stranger, "that we are three, surrounded by thy officers and unable to add to our numbers or deplete them without thy wish. You look!" and seizing the rope the young man, who had thrown aside his outer garments and now appeared in a suit of gleaming silver, tossed it up "talking string" was the telephone into the air. The effort was a slight one, yet the rope rose as if propelled by great force, and when above the palace walls disappeared. A moment later down it came, and upon It the emperor and his officers saw sliding down a human form, and before they could recover from their astonishment a young man had reached the ground and, saluting his Majesty, handed him a square package wrapped in rice paper,

"Canst thou tell from whence said. came this messenger?" asked the youth.

"Perhaps he came over the palace or's advisers.

"Did not the messenger leave a package?" replied the youth. "True, he did," said the monarch, who now unfolded the package, finally holding up to view a small painting representing a pastoral mountains were seen in the distance, skirting a valley covered with green grass, and in the foreground, in bold relief, stood a pure white cow.

"The picture is a gift to your Majesty," said the youth, "and skill of the painter, it has certain of the instincts of the living animal, Your Majesty observes that now, in remools, its accessibility by virtue of the light of day, the cow is feeding; but take the picture into the darkest plate the future development of the room of the palace, or examine it at be arrived at? The emperor was incredulous, yet he held the cup to his ear, and when the prince had reached the end of the courtyard and the cord he listened, and out of the bamboo dered, 64c per pound. cup came a soft voice saying: "O, mighty emperor! I have no wish to be thy adviser, but thy friend. If I have shown thee that there are things yet new to thee in high life, and other things yet to learn, my mission is ended. The talking string is thine." Astonished, the emperor replied to the talking string, and summoned the prince to his side, now eager to have so wise a man as his counsellor. But the latter would not accept his favors, and after a week of feasting ind merriment, he departed for his wn country in the unknown west. To the emperor the acts and gifts vere nothing less than roagical; but n reality they were simple affairs. The appearance of the young man pparently descending from the louds is a bit of Jugglery familiar in India even today. The picture was skillfully made by using phosphores ent paint, prepared by the natives of certain portions of the East neary a thousand years ago. By using ordinary paint for the day picture and luminous paint for the one at night, the illusion was created. In ther words, the cow pictured lying down behind a fence was put on in luminous paste and was seen only at night-a simple arrangement, easily accomplished today. The
